English allows students to count up to two courses outside of English literature towards the major. Normally one of the two is a course in literature in another language. Such courses can be taken in any semester and in any department, but we ask you to explain their relevance to your studies within the major. Examples: a Renaissance art or history class, to enrich a seminar on Renaissance poetry; an African-American Studies course that helps you prepare a senior essay in American literature. If you wish to include a course outside of the English Department in your major, please list it below.
